

THE SAEREN CHRONICLES

The last ordinary morning of Viridia's life smelled like scorched bread and her mother's tea.

Three days later she walks through the gates of Hazel — the most prestigious school for mages in the country — orphaned, silent, and certain of one thing: no one is ever going to see her grieve.

In a world that long ago tore its magic cleanly in two, Viridia was born whole. Both halves. The one thing Hazel was built to make certain could never exist. To be known is to be killed. So she makes herself small — and lets in one person: Alice, the only girl who sees the drowning underneath the quiet.

Then the people who fear what this school hides decide to burn it down — and a girl who survives by disappearing must choose between the many she can save and the one she cannot bear to lose.

A quiet, lyrical fantasy about grief, found family, and a girl who refuses to be made small.
